It will not take much analysis to see the flaws in this argument. The thesis of the project, project management, is not supported by the evidence presented. The author assumes that because the project manager is responsible for managing the project, therefore the project will be successful. However, this overlooks the fact that the project manager is only one part of the project team and that the success of the project depends on the contributions of all team members. The author also ignores the impact of external factors such as changes in market conditions or unexpected problems. The author concludes that the project manager's role is crucial to the success of the project, but this is not supported by the evidence presented.

The author's argument is also weakened by the use of ad hominem attacks. The author criticizes the project manager for not being able to meet deadlines or achieve project goals, but these criticisms are not relevant to the argument that needs to be made. The author also mentions that the project manager is responsible for managing the project, but this is not supported by the evidence presented. The author's conclusion is based on assumptions and not on evidence, and therefore it is not a valid argument.
